The game was released on a standard retail release date. The Entertainment Software Rating Board (ESRB) the organization that assigns ratings to video games in North America, rated Grand Theft Auto IV E (Everyone). The 'E' is the first rating in the ESRB scale of content descriptors, containing content that is generally considered to be suitable for all ages and audiences. This was partially due to the game's age rating, which was 18, and also due to the ESRB's increasingly difficult policy of requesting that video game manufacturers alter games in such a way that they can be rated earlier. After retail release, sales of the game were "extremely strong" according to Rene Fiore, the vice president of marketing and operations for Take-Two Interactive. At retail, the game's prices ranged from, with the PS3 version priced at and the Xbox 360 version at the most expensive. Microsoft announced that it would continue offering the Xbox Live service for Grand Theft Auto IV after its initial launch. The game required the Xbox 360's Kinect camera, which became available with the Xbox 360 version of the game, sold as a separate bundle. The game's roster of achievements were also made available for the Xbox 360 version. In the European Union, the game was the second bestselling retail title for the Xbox 360 and PlayStation 3; however, it was also the first game to sell more than one million units in the United States. After the game's release, the ESRB announced it would support the game's Mature rating. In response to the game's E rating and mature content, the UK's Digital, Culture, Media and Sport Select Committee called on the government to "clarify the definition of what should be considered indecent and dangerous" and to "55cdc1ed1c
